Understanding Recent Unrest in France:

Tyler Stovall, Department of History, University of California, Berkeley
Loïc Wacquant, Department of Sociology, University of California, Berkeley

For several weeks in late 2005 France experienced nightly riots. Originally touched off after the accidental electrocution of two young men of North African descent fleeing police, the riots tapped into a deep resentment around racism and lack of opportunity for immigrants and their children within French society. The French government's proposed changes in labor law introduced in March of this year, partially an attempt to alleviate high youth unemployment which are perceived to underlie the riots, again provoked massive unrest this time in the form of protest organized by opposition parties, student organizations and labor unions.

Join Professors Tyler Stovall and Loïc Wacquant for an engaging discussion on the issues of race, ethnicity, and class that have rocked France in recent months.
